

The New York Times

What to See in New York City Art Galleries This Week

By ROBERTA SMITH

OCT. 25, 2017

John Zurier's "Far (For Hreinn Fridfinnsson)," from 2016. Credit Peter Blum Gallery, New York

John Zurier

*Through Nov. 11. Peter Blum Gallery, 176 Grand Street, Manhattan;
212-244-6055, peterblumgallery.com*

The Peter Blum Gallery has moved to a space on the Lower East Side that is so much like its previous one, on 57th Street, that it seems simply to have slightly expanded its space in all directions. The architectural resemblance can make you laugh, but “Stars Without Distance,” John Zurier’s show of new paintings here, may take your breath away.

Mr. Zurier has devoted over two decades to making increasingly engaging monochromatic paintings that are not quite monochromes. Their delicate fields of blue, mint green, pink, yellow or smudgy white are airy and semitransparent. Their brushwork is thin-skinned, and there is much else going on: thin lines often border these fields or cut through them. Small boxy marks — dabs from a narrow brush — pace off distances at the sides or sneak into the fields where they sometimes resemble stars in the firmament. The paint moves into corners, creating irregularities that reveal other colors. These elements are especially clear in “Taktur,” a deep blue surface edged in lighter blue, with a wire-thin line crossing the field top and bottom. Each line has a white mark above and below it. These arrangements add intimations of quietly sparkling moonlit views at sea.

Mr. Zurier's "Taktur," from 2017. Credit Peter Blum Gallery, New York

Mr. Zurier's paintings are acts of full disclosure; you see every decision, gesture and mark that went into their making. This is true of many foundational postwar painters, especially Jackson Pollock and Robert Ryman. But Mr. Zurier's process is more intuitive and personal. No detail of a painting determines any other; you absorb each, oddity by oddity, fitting them into the whole, and into the experience of really looking.

ROBERTA SMITH

A version of this article appears in print on October 27, 2017, on p. C19 of the New York Times under the heading: "Weekend Arts/Galleries."